ANSWERSHEET

I'm going to comment on the quotation of a French poet and playwright, Molière. He was sure that the harder a problem a person's going through is, the more glory he or she will receive after succeeding it. It's the main idea of the Molière's works.

Personally I agree with the quotation. To start with, in today's world, we are confronting various undesirable problems, such as social and professional complications. We're constantly worrying, which leads to anxiety, stress and other mental health problems. I believe that they make people feel insecure about their powers. Thus, we tend to be unsure about our ability to fight problems, programming ourselves to a fault before we even do something. Despite these challenges, the solution isn't to stop believing in ourselves, but rather to seek a solution of the problem.

Let's imagine that a person was struggling with an obstacle. Instead of holding their hands in defeat, they fought back. When they found a solution, they were proud of themselves. Obviously, the harder was the problem, the better they felt after getting over it. And that's the main point of the quotation.

In conclusion, the truth is: individuals who had solved difficult problems are statistically more confident than those who haven't gotten through such difficulties. And that is all I wanted to tell you about the quotation.
